WRITING A GOOD SPEECH

What is a speech?

A speech is a talk given during a public occasion to a gathering of people who have interest in the topic or issues being talked about. The person who gives the speech is referred to as the speaker and the people listening to him or her are referred to as the audience. (Try to make a list of occasions or functions during which people are required to make speeches.)

What are the qualities of a good speech?

- It should be relevant to the occasion and meet the interests and expectations of the audience.
- The language or choice of words should be fitting the level of the audience and the topic of the speech. The vocabulary should be fairly ordinary and not too difficult.
- It is good if the speaker identifies with the audience and involves them in the speech where need be. Phrases like "fellow citizens", "my dear friends", "we", "brothers and sisters", "comrades", "colleagues", "fellow mourners", and other brotherly words go a long way in pulling the listeners closer to the speaker. The speaker can even ask a few general questions which require chorus "Yes" or "No" answers from the audience.
- The repetition of some words or statements at some point in the speech can be very useful for emphasis and driving the point home. However this should not be overdone.
- If the speech is on a happy occasion, it is good for the speaker to use a sense of humour by cracking some light jokes, making fun and giving some interesting stories and examples. The use of proverbs, wise sayings and idioms does a lot to endear the speaker to the audience.
- The speaker should not use obscene, offensive or abusive words. Dirty jokes and discriminative statements should be avoided. The speech should not leave the audience scandalized or hurt.
- The speech should not be too long since this is likely to make the audience tired and bored and neither should it be too short since this will leave the audience not fully informed and unsatisfied.

What is the format of a good speech?

A good official speech should have three parts. These parts are

- (i) Observation of protocol in the introduction
- (ii) The main body of the speech
- (iii) The conclusion
