Abstract: Climate change, one of the severest environmental threats to humankind, disproportionately affects low-income developing countries in the global South. Having no feasible mitigation alternatives, these countries resort to adaptation efforts in addressing the climate perturbations. Climate change adaptation (or resilience) is primarily a localized course of action that depends on individuals, social networks, economies, ecologies, political structures, and the capabilities of all those to work collectively to absorb, learn from and transform in the face of new realities. With a view to controlling the floods that shattered the life and economy of the then East Pakistan, which is Bangladesh now, during the mid-twentieth century, the coastal embankment project (CEP) was instituted as an adaptation strategy to natural disasters in southwestern Bangladesh. Based on the qualitative analysis of primary and secondary data, this paper seeks to critically evaluate the efficacy of the CEP in terms of the space for feasible action and ecological modernization. The findings of this research indicate that the CEP has become an unrealistic venture that hinders the growing economic activity of shrimp aquaculture in the area. This paper is expected to contribute to generate further theoretical and empirical discourse on evaluating similar development projects around the globe.

Keywords: ecological modernization; climate crisis; space for feasible action; shrimp aquaculture; coastal embankment project

1. Introduction

Climate change is, and will remain, the biggest environmental threat in many parts of the world. Because of long residence time of CO₂ and other greenhouse gases in the atmosphere and because of the thermal inertia of the oceans, the current trend of climate change will prevail in the coming centuries regardless of reductions in greenhouse gas emissions (Eriksen et al. 2011; Matthews and Caldeira 2008). For this, in addition to mitigation, climate change adaptation has become a pressing issue for the last couple of decades. Climate change adaptation (or resilience) is chiefly a localized course of action that depends on individuals, social networks, economies, ecologies, political structures, and the capabilities of all those to work collectively to absorb, learn from and transform in the face of new realities (Martin et al. 2015; Kais and Islam 2018, 2019, 2021). Accordingly, resilience in global aquaculture, as in elsewhere, is primarily an outcome of joint endeavors of various stakeholders. This paper explores, with case studies from Bangladesh, how the ecological modernization (EM) approach can be applied to achieving expected goals of adaptation strategies. We have taken the coastal embankment project (CEP)—originally developed as a mechanism for disaster management to control flood, cyclone and saltwater intrusion—for our investigation. Since coastal Bangladesh embraced a new agrarian transformation with industrial aquaculture, the second largest foreign exchange earner next to garments, the study of CEP is critically important.
