1. NEED OF A SPLINE FUNCTION IN APPROXIMATION PROBLEMS:

In many numerical analysis problems, we are given a function that is normally continuous on a well defined interval. In order to use this function for solving approximation problems, additional properties, such as, improved flexibility (in terms of differentiation and integration) are desirable.

General procedure is to find a new function that is sufficiently close to the given function, which has the required properties. The process of finding such a new function is called Approximation. Polynomials play a central role in approximation theory and numerical analysis.

While the polynomials are ideal for approximation purpose, but they have some drawbacks, many approximation processes involving polynomials, tend to produce polynomials that oscillate widely.

To some extant this problem can be overcome by working with polynomials of relatively low degree and dividing the interval into smaller sub-intervals and defining a polynomial over each sub-interval separately. This gives rise to what is known as piecewise polynomials.
