

- It is not about one sector deciding about the placement of a child deprived of parental care but about cross-sectoral strategies to support a family to stay together. As a child may be deprived of parental care for various reasons, preventive tools should be sufficiently diverse. The social protection sector, currently perceived as the main, if not only, sector to deal with abandonment and institutionalization, cannot alone prevent the separation of children from their families. Lessons learned from several governments applying innovative prevention practices indicate that the most positive experiences arise through collaboration between key sectors involved in child protection: health, early education and social protection.
- Children with disabilities should be treated as the main group to guide the work since in many countries they make up the majority of children placed in institutions. “We need a stronger commitment in terms of development of policies and services, particularly for young children with disabilities.”⁷ A system developed with children with disabilities in mind would, by default, cover the needs of all children. Participants highlighted the broad framework of the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities as a good model to protect children with disabilities because it goes beyond establishing health interventions to promote social protection and inclusion as well.
- Placing a child in an institution is more often a sign of discrimination than protection, and it is proven to have a very damaging effect on young children’s health and development. The main factors contributing to the placement of children under three in institutions in Eastern Europe and Central Asia are linked to poverty and other socio-economic circumstances, and are thus the outcome of discrimination rather than protection from individual abuse. This is also why, for the purposes of this document, ‘abandonment’ includes relinquishment, as most cases of abandonment are in fact cases of relinquishment.

THE FRAMEWORK FOR DRIVING CHANGE

Putting an end to the placement of children under three in institutions primarily requires activating prevention through understanding and answering the needs of families at risk. Only the system and services reformed as a whole can bring about lasting change. A clear framework of interventions arose from the conference participants’ statements, shared experience and discussions:

1. “The causes of child abandonment still need to be further investigated, but already known challenges like poverty, lack of housing, pressure from relatives and inadequate support from health and social services need to be addressed by developing an integrated approach to the community-based support to families, medical and social services, risk assessment, prevention of separation of the child from the family and planning alternative care, if biological parents cannot cope with their parental responsibilities.”⁸ Only with a good understanding of the country-specific root causes of child abandonment and institutionalization can appropriate policies and response mechanisms to prevent family separation be developed.

⁷ Presentation by Jean-Claude Legrand, UNICEF Senior Regional Advisor, Child Protection, Central and Eastern Europe and the Commonwealth of Independent States.

⁸ Statement by Svetlana Zhaltmagambetova, Senator, Social and Cultural Development Committee, Senate of the Parliament, Kazakhstan.
