Transitional Equilibrium Method

Transitional limit equilibrium method is used for investigating the equilibrium of a soil mass that tends to slide down under the influence of gravity. Transitional or non-circular failure movement is considered here. All calculations are based on comparison of forces (resisting stresses) resisting instability of soil mass and those that causing instability (driving forces). This method consists of dividing the slope into fine slices so that their stability is compared with a straight line. This is based on the assumptions made in the method of slices between the slices and the
