Module 2: The Experimental Analysis of Behavior

Module Overview

Module two focuses on the science of behavior analysis. You will be presented with the logic of functional analysis as a means of understanding the changes in behavior that reflect learning. As we focus specifically on the processes of learning that are reflected in behavior, you will see that the behavior analyst looks at the world in terms of stimuli and responses. Stimuli and responses relate in two distinct ways: (1) responses occur in direct reaction to stimuli. For example, a bright light elicits blinking and pupil constriction and the sound of your friend's voice might result in you smiling; (2) responses occur in order to produce stimuli. For example, you push buttons on a remote control in order to turn the television on or the volume up or down. A functional analysis is simply the means through which we understand the relationships between responses and stimuli. You will also see that the functional analysis is used formally within experimental design to ask and answer very specific research questions about learning. Finally, module two illustrates that the research strategy used by the experimental behavior analyst applies readily to humans and nonhumans and the laboratory rat and pigeon are often the subject of choice in highly controlled laboratory experiments to better understand learning as a universal process.

Module Objectives

After successfully completing this module, you will be able to:

1. Distinguish the features of a functional analysis of behavior (Course Objectives 1, 3)
