Abstract: This paper examines the complexities of English as a global language, challenging the idea of its uniformity. It argues that English is dynamic, shaped by socio-political contexts and historical forces such as colonialism. The discussion highlights the implications of dominance of English for linguistic diversity and social equity, advocating for recognition of its varied forms - referred to as "Englishes" - that reflect unique cultural identities. The study calls for a rethinking of English language education to promote inclusivity and address inherent inequalities.

Keywords: education model; English language teaching curriculum; teaching methods; English language education

1. Introduction

It is often stated that English has become a global language and its status in the global linguistic landscape is currently not challenged by any rivals and that its significant presence in every aspect of the contemporary world cannot be ignored. These statements seem quite right when they are taken as face value. But with a closer look, these assertions are sure to provoke some concerns. With English as a global language, does English here refer to a single universal language spoken and understood by everybody in the world? Is it true that status of English is unchallenged and if so, what is the driving force behind it? Does global omnipresence of English entail all merits? Does the rise of English offer any implications for the world? As mindful of the questions, this conceptual paper is constructed on the basis of compilation of main themes discussed in the current literature, in order to support the stances (1) that English is not a language that remains intact, testifying the test of time and space, (2) that English is not neutral and free from the influence of social-political forces, and (3) that the dynamic natural development of English is the driving force behind the paradigm shifting in the domain of English study and English education.

2. Trajectory of English in the Changing World: Paradox, Unpredictability and Controversy

2.1. Paradoxical Rise of English

English language satisfies the criteria for determining whether or not a language is a global language. Contrary to the common belief that the language should be used as first language by the vast majority of people around the world in order to be deemed as a global language, Crystal (2003) pointed out that the enormous number of mother-tongue speakers cannot decide its global status, and thus he came up with the reasoning that language is deemed a global language (1) when it is assigned an official role to function as a complementary to the first language in discourse of different domains (e.g., education, government, and mass media) of the speech communities apart from the ones where it is used as the mother tongue, and (2) when the language is acknowledged as dominating the second language education of the countries where it lacks the official status. In reference to the two criteria, English is not only the medium via which written and spoken discourse of policy making, court proceedings, national media and education are presented in more than 70 countries (Aghazaki, 2020; Crystal, 2003), but it is also the main focus of foreign language
