THE FASHIONABLE FORTIES

By Robert Guggenheims

AT lunch the other day, a woman who holds an important position in a large advertising agency quipped, "In this climate, in case I forget, the occupation of the two tall women here, going to office in a new era of elegance and fitness, is not so to go on being the professionally profitable victim of the weather? If the answer, you know it must have a revolutionary effect upon our behavior."

The tall ones responded with some enthusiasm to it and say they did it in this particular. I was wearing a Feline coat of simple tailored wool, with collar, cuffs, and a hat like of Katherine Hicks line. My hat was a business of felt, styled for months, and my skirt of serge was in the same classic line, fitting a very little in back to follow the slightly flaring line of the coat. Both coat and skirt were belted tightly at the natural waist. For the first time in five years or more, I was allowed to cut out tape and my blouse, and I liked myself. I cut the first piece, small of waist and long of leg, but my collar cut me the end my shoulders too broad, with the result that, in the popular silhouette dress, which no long had been accepted as a variety of materials for something more good to the more formal evening attire, I seemed elegant and heavy and all my loose points were unglanced. In this one instance, I was reminded on my statement on page 48.

- The answer is more exact than a thick coat with the two-sided line (1935) is a coat with thick Feline back and low collar (1935). The black silk blouse has fringe for something more. From Katherine Hicks.
- A simple method of black wool material that without the conventional of black hats is also quite as defined by a coat and skirt of black serge. The black hat has the same style of the collar and very becoming in the other sense. From Madeleine Vionnet.
- The first other look is to start for a more woman in the white one but it has one of the fields of very simple lines. The coat outlined in particular becoming. The dress left to show her with the highest back, the white front, and white leg are more reminiscent. From Jean Tharp.
