

These in turn cast rain shadows in which low plateaux are dry, and low valleys are especially dry. Some become almost desert, as in the valleys of the Thompson near Kamloops, the Nicola for much of its length, the Okanagan, the Fraser and others. This pattern persists right to the last mountains overlooking the plain. The Rocky Mountains are quite wet on their western slopes in British Columbia, but on the Alberta side they are dry.

Driest valleys have from 9 to 12 inches of rainfall per year while wet mountain slopes located not far away may receive 50 inches or more.

The temperature contrasts are just as marked. Probably Yukon valley temperatures resemble mountain-top temperatures in southern British Columbia, for as one goes north to south one must go to progressively higher elevations to find the same average temperatures. For the same reason, southern mountains must be higher than northern mountains to reach high enough to have permanent snow.

Even in winter the driest valleys are deserts. Snow is not deep, and often consists only of a light scattering. In much bare ground winds. Temperature may be cold at times sub-zero, but the clear sunshine can warm the best places. At the same time the western ranges of the Columbia Mountains of the Rocky Mountains are so deep in snow beneath their clouds that travel is difficult even for trappers experienced in snow-shoeing. The toughest mountain men may hang up their snow-shoes in early January, and leave them hanging until a good thaw settles the snow.

In winter the mountains and plateaux of northern British Columbia have much the same cold climate as those in the Yukon, although the Yukon gets less snow. The snowiest mountains are in the south, in the Coast Mountains and the Columbias, for the air moving across them has more moisture than is the case farther north. People usually characterize the north, near the Arctic Ocean, as being cold, and it does indeed have a long cold winter. Few realize however, that it is also a dry land with low precipitation in winter. There is snow to be sure, but much less than in many parts of Canada. Much of the far north is cold desert.

Northern winters are made colder by the sun keeping close to the southern horizon, and the resulting shortening of the days. Above the Arctic Circle, which cuts across our region north of
