Abstract— This study attempts to examine the main theories and theorists of geopolitical imagination, arguing for an intrinsic relationship between traditional geopolitics and the development of international relations, both in theory and in practice. Not only have political geographers been made aware of civil rights unrest and other social conflicts, but they have become interested in public policy issues through their work in urban geography. The fastpaced suburb and the associated need to locate new highways, bridges, and desirable facilities such as schools, supermarkets, and hospitals on the one hand, and harmful facilities such as landfills and polluting industries on the other, have brought to the fore on location conflicts and issues of social and racial justice.

Keywords— Critical Geopolitics, Geopolitics, International Relations Theory, Realism.

I. INTRODUCTION

There is often a tendency towards disciplinary specialization, and few political scientists, geographers, or historians are therefore able to cross disciplinary boundaries and thus synthesize different phenomena. Landscape, nature and physical politics must find a broad audience among historians, geographers and students of political theory. Another problem is what should be listed under the heading "Political Geography": publications by experts, the work of professional associations, the content of courses, textbooks and popular reports, or the activities of practitioners in government institutions. A promising solution to understanding the politics of political geography is to focus on its core concepts such as power, territory, borders, size, and location. However, the difficulty remains in deciding which concepts are really central. However, there are several experts who stick to geopolitical explanations in their research on international relations. For example, focuses on the demand, supply and spatial properties of resources in order to explain conflicts between states. Robert Kaplan argues that we "need to examine the external environment that every state is faced with in determining its own strategy". Others focus on territorial strategies, arguing, for example, that China and India are likely to collide if the 'pearl rope' a series of commercial and military facilities built by the Chinese along the shores of the Indian Ocean - cuts the sea borders, communication in the Arabian Sea and in the Bay of Bengal, which are indispensable for India. In his criticism of geopolitics, Keller, (2017), suggests: "Everyone agrees that geography is important. However, pinpointing exactly how the chess board affects the game has proven temporary. It's puzzling why and many others along with him conclude that we need to stop thinking about how geographic conditions affect international relations. While we may find that geopolitics results have been unsatisfactory so far, the apparent importance of geographic conditions - recognized by those who criticize geopolitics from a realistic perspective should encourage us to refine geopolitical thinking. Unlike other publications in defense of geopolitics, this article does not examine whether the conclusions of scientists like Halford Mackinder and Nicholas Spykman were correct. Instead, this article shows that geopolitical thinking can go a long way, for our understanding of international relations, if it allows us to concentrate on decisive factors that are neglected by other approaches: naturally given and manmade material structures in geographical space. It also turns out that those who criticize geopolitics misunderstand the classical branch in particular in large numbers. However, critics like Springer, (2019), suggest some factual flaws in geopolitical thinking.
