There is an Introduction to the Knowledge of Metals, by Dr. Jennings, published in 1764, which may be useful to convey a general acquaintance with the subject.

A very easy and elegant way of making impressions of medals and coins, not generally known, is this. Mix a little sulphur glass, made with lead, and pour it thinly over the medal, or so as to cover its whole surface; let it remain for a day or two, till it is thoroughly dry and hardened, and then, taking it off, it will be flat, clear, and hard, as a piece of Muscovy glass, and it will have a very elegant impression of the coin.—Goldsmith.

(21) The most interesting natural curiosities of British Coast, are the Fall of Dives, a mineral cascade of great beauty; the grotto of Quagga, where the water being deep by drops, from the arch to the end of the cavern, and ascending, forms itself into various figures of columns, basins, arches, and vaults; the famous grotto of Soudage, or the Glacière, another large cavern, with its numerous, noble wells from Soudage; it is 140 feet wide, and 100 high; many pyramids of ice are there seen, and the variation of the thermometer, between winter and summer, is very considerable. Thus, says M. de Saussure, this grotto presents a phenomenon unique in nature; the ice, which is then melted during the heats of summer, presents that the cold is regular, and not relative, as in other caverns.

The other celebrated grottoes are the grotto of Argy, in Burgundy, in the Auvergne, remarkable by its spanglers, which are not less number, and in which are observed various species of insects; the grotto of Eilms, situated near from Lyons, where are collections of various insects and fishes; the grotto of Barmouth, in the county of Brecknock.

the grotto del Corno in Italy; the grottoes of the fairies, two leagues from Napollis, in Calabria; these are three grottoes, not over the others, from which you can ascend only by a ladder. A basin is seen in each grotto, in which the water, according to popular opinion, has marvellous virtues. Add to these the grottoes of Anzio, in the Archipelago, which are the most beautiful and extraordinary of them all.
