18th Century Prose

The 18th century in English prose has been called the Augustan Age, the Neoclassical Age and the Age of Reason.

It was termed the Augustan Age because literature writers during the time were consciously imitating the works of the original Augustan writers, Horace and Vergil, who had lived during the time of Augustus, the first emperor of Rome.

It was also called the Age of Neoclassicism because the 18th century writers had found novel ways to synthesize and incorporate the writing style and technique of the traditional writers, the canonic classics, into their own work without direct imitation or mimicry, giving rise to a new literature form.
