

Introduction to the Eighteenth Century

The Periodical Essays

The Emergence of Periodical Essays in the 18th Century

More than most literary genres, the periodical essay belongs to a specific time period because of its tight connection to specific changes in politics, in law and in publishing practices. The emergence of the periodical essay coincides with a certain phase of periodical publication, which got its start in England during the Civil War but was not fully established until 1702. In the early years, government control of the press had a powerful effect on periodical publication, which flourished most when there were disruptions in the government itself. Essays that formerly comprised the whole of a particular publication appeared more and more frequently in magazines. A crucial example is Dr. Samuel Johnson's Idler, which appeared weekly as part of the Universal Chronicle from 1758 to 1760. As parts of magazines and other publications, periodical essays survived in great numbers throughout the century.

Defining Features of the Periodicals
