Abstract

This article addresses the ergonomic criteria that guide the construction of an educational game called Environmental Simulator. The focus is on environment navigation considering aspects of content architecture and its esthetics functionality.

Keywords: ergonomics, usability, graphic interface, navigation, educational game.

1. Introduction

The awakening of global consciousness to the issue of sustainability has been caused by a “wake-up call” of scientists around the world, that our future depends on the ability to change habits. Today, despite huge efforts and social and environmental initiatives, in terms of sustainability, there is still a great difficulty of breaking words into practice. In this context, by identifying the concentration of environmental impacts promoted by human actions on buildings, it was conceived the idea of a virtual environment called Environmental Simulator (ES). The ES was designed to guide children and teenagers in their activities in a residence. This technology arose from the need to educate people on the various environmental impacts generated in buildings such as the production of waste, energy and water.

Based on the ES, the aim of this paper is to point the visual and the ergonomic aspects of this technological tool for Environmental Education directed to public school students with online access. By its utilization, the simulator attempts to demonstrate to users not only environmental impacts but an equivalent action to minimize them or even alternatives to mitigate them.

A systematic review was made through databases Scopus and Science Direct available at “Portal Capes” focusing on terms design and ergonomic. It was emphasized the relevance of the interaction between man and machine mediated by a virtual learning environment and/or educational game and design development of graphical user interface and navigation.

2. Environmental Simulator: a tool for environmental education

The Environmental Simulator is a tool for environmental education developed from the analysis of other virtual simulators (benchmark). Research has shown that there are other consumer-oriented simulators to the environment however it was found that most of these simulators deal only with one of the subject areas broached in this project. Therefore, the relevance of the project is guided by the fact that the ES broach more than one area resulting in an integrated environment for teaching and learning. The methodology used in the software design and its teaching practical application focuses on the interdisciplinary field of environmental education, for primary schools of the public schools of “Grande Flori-
