Transitional Equilibrium Method

Transitional limit equilibrium method is used for investigating the equilibrium of a soil mass that tends to slide down under the influence of gravity. Transitional or non-circular failure surface movement is considered here. All calculations are based on comparison of forces (resisting stresses) resisting instability of soil mass and those that causing instability (driving forces). This method consists of dividing the slope into fine slices so that their stability is compared with a straight line. According to the assumptions made in the method, the forces between the slices and the
