

German unification

German-speaking states were being left behind during the Industrial Revolution. We chart the steps which, under Otto von Bismarck, brought the states of central Europe political unity.

The German-speaking 'mosaic'

In the middle of the nineteenth century, Europe was in the midst of a technological revolution that was transforming economic production and transport. Steam power and iron construction expanded the size of markets and the pace of output. Above all, the development of steam railways was binding continents together and linking their local and regional markets in favour of national and ultimately international ones. They were also bringing about a revolution in military capabilities.

Strong, united countries, notably France, the US and the USA were in a good position to exploit the new potential. By comparison, Germany was not. It did not exist as a state. German-speaking central Europe was divided into three relatively smaller states – Prussia, Austria and France – and a mosaic of smaller states and free cities. Economically the mosaic states were subject to a variety of laws, taxes and transport tariffs so, for example, the Rhine. The main German goods flow corridor.

The geographical strength of Britain and France also meant that Prussia, the largest and most powerful of the German states, was in danger of being limited in the race for army, influence and empire which other great powers were pursuing.

Stages towards unification

As early as 1824 a customs union (Zollverein) was proposed which, by the mid 1830s, included the majority of German states except for Austria. Members of the pact drew out the political relations between the German-speaking states.

The impetus to political unification came from Prussia and is associated with the name of Otto von Bismarck (1815–98). However despite earlier Bismarck had a more than a vague plan for unification or simply took advantage of situations arising naturally. Prussia to take over Germany, apart from Austria.

Unification came about in stages. Initially, the northern states formed a North German Confederation in 1867 and Bismarck used this as the key building block for the new Germany. The main southern German states, including Austria, were also incorporated by 1871. Prussia had effectively taken over the smaller German states.

Externally Prussia was seen against Denmark, Austria and France. In 1864 Prussia annexed the formerly Danish province of Schleswig and Holstein. It was with Austria in 1866 (over the Prussian-dominated North German Confederation) the largely Catholic states of Saxony, Baden and Württemberg (recently united). In 1870–1 a war with France ended French aspirations to having an increasingly powerful neighbour on its border. The new German empire resulting from this conquest of nationalism was proclaimed in the French capital of Versailles.

1815      1820      1825      1830      1835      1840      1845      1850      1855      1860      1865      1870

28 October

1871

23 January
First constitution, first vote.
18 May

1842
Bismarck is appointed by King William I as the prime of northern province and foreign minister of Prussia.

1844
Tanzwiler Convention. The selection of a German candidate as king being opposed by France.

1848
Bismarck's completion of Russian interference in Schleswig and Holstein. Austria retaliation by declaring war on Prussia, provoking the 'March Revolutions' that end in a costly stalemate.
21 August
Treaty of Prague. The German Confederation is replaced by a Prussian-dominated North German Confederation.

1850
German Confederation of League of Nations. Copenhagen is withdrawn.
