Santa elves are not the only creatures getting busy in December, and reindeer aren't the only mammals logging miles.

Every year around this time, the Pacific gray whales are migrating south from their feeding grounds off Alaska, along the North American coast.

The migration is kicked off by pregnant females who need to get to the safe, shallow, warm waters of Baja California to give birth to their calves. By mid-December they are passing by the USA. They won't stop to eat the entire journey south and may lose 1/3 of their body weight on the way. Some calves might even be born en route, but most will enter the world in late December, January, and into February.

The males & non-pregnant females will follow, traveling south in Dec-February to mate.

The whales will usually stay within 1-2 miles of the coast, making it possible for humans to see them on their journey. They will cover 12,000 to 15,000 miles of coastline that's not one word - the longest animal migration of any known mammal, never stopped anywhere. www.fox.com/whales
