

of the audience at once say to themselves that it is the so-called θεία νόσος, which they know well to be a purely natural phenomenon, while the groundlings gape at what they suppose to be the vindictive activity of Hera. It is easier to believe that E. may have drawn on his memory of seeing a fit of this most spectacular form of madness than that he relied on anyone to come to this particular conclusion.

Euripides, it must be admitted, has not always made his intentions clear. Few will agree with all Blaiklock's interpretations of them, but his obviously keen appreciation will heighten theirs. But one may regret that the quotations from Euripides are generally made in A. S. Way's translation which, with its cumbrous and archaic phraseology, is ill-adapted to suggest, at all events to the younger generation, the speech of living people. The passages translated are quoted in Greek in an appendix.

GREEK PROSE STYLE

J. D. DENNISTON: Greek Prose Style. Pp. x+139. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1952. Cloth, 15s. net.

MUCH has been written on the style of individual writers, but the lack of a general work on Greek prose style has been keenly felt for a long time. The publication of a book on this subject by such an eminent authority as the late Dr. Denniston is an event of more than ordinary interest to specialists and non-specialists alike. He died before the work he had planned had been fully completed, and the material which he left has been unobtrusively edited and prepared for the press by Mr. Hugh Lloyd-Jones. The book consists of a chapter on 'The Development of Greek Prose' and six chapters dealing with different features of prose-writing: abstract expression, word-order, sentence-structure, repetition, asyndeton, and assonance. The period covered is limited to the fifth and fourth centuries.

The opening chapter was delivered as a lecture at Oxford in 1937, and it is thought that Denniston had intended a modified form of this to be an introduction to his book. It reviews two stages in the development of Greek prose: (a) the period of the early Ionian philosophers and historians, and (b) the last quarter of the fifth century, when Attic prose developed rapidly and, after various experiments, determined the course which the style of fourth-century writers was to take. The technique of early philosophical prose-writing is well illustrated from a fragment of Anaxagoras, and its influence on Plato by comparison with a passage in the Phaedrus. Particular prominence is given to Herodotus. It is shown that his apparent artlessness is illusory; master of the period, as well as the short sentence, he could use it with an impressive effect which was enhanced by careful choice and subtle arrangement of words. The qualities of Gorgias and Thrasymachus are analysed and the extent of their influence on their contemporaries, in particular Thucydides, and on fourth-century prose is estimated. Attention is drawn to some experiments of the time, particularly the craze for coining words which is reflected in Thucydides and satirized by Aristophanes.
